14. General Objectives

These are the general objectives of this course:

1. To study POLITICS, in the Aristotelian sense, as the study of "the authority that governs those who have the same origin and those who are free."

2. To study Political Science, in its modern sense, as the study of Power, political power, in order to understand what leads, or can lead, to its conquest, maintenance, and exercise.

15. Specific Objectives

These are the specific objectives of this course:

1. To understand the importance of POLITICS throughout all periods.

2. To grasp the significance of CITIZENSHIP and the rights and responsibilities associated with it.

3. To comprehend the STATE in its various forms, as well as the concept of SOVEREIGNTY in its traditional context and in light of the current European and international circumstances.

4. To differentiate between the Form of Power and the actual Seat of Power.

16. Skills to be acquired

The learning provided by this discipline enables students to acquire knowledge about how political activity operates in the State, leading them to understand who makes decisions and the legitimacy they possess for decision-making. The education imparted will equip students not only for the study of other subjects within international relations, law, sociology, and economics but also for a strong preparation in actively exercising their citizenship.

17. Teaching Methodology

The teaching of this discipline comprises:

- Theoretical-Practical classes for the transmission of content and the illustration of specific situations related to that content.
- Tutorial Orientation classes aimed at assisting students in proper bibliographic research and a correct understanding of the topics covered.
