14. General Objectives

The course aims to introduce the student to scientific research in Criminal Law. This research experience from legal texts will help prepare the student for the monographic research that is asked of him/her in the master's thesis.

15. Specific Objectives

The work requested requires the student to critically evaluate the doctrinal and jurisprudential positions on the chosen topic and should demonstrate the student's ability to prepare and write the master's dissertation.

16. Skills to be acquired

The discussion of doctrine and case law allows students to address general issues in view of concrete cases. This critical work will help prepare the student for the research required in the master's thesis.

17. Teaching Methodology

The subject is taught over one semester and assessment will be based on student participation. This participation should include the presentation and discussion of a written work, prepared through individual tutoring. This presentation allows for the communication of individual research experiences and individual tutorials by the teacher allow overcoming individual difficulties. In the initial lessons the programmatic contents will be deepened.
